the players were told that a special car awaited them at the depot, and in anticipation of comfort and enjoyment several of them purchased books and cards to while away the time. Billy Harris bought two packs all at once. About 8 o'clock

Ward led his forces to the railroad depot and looked for the special car. It was out of sight, Ward led his forces to the railroad depot and looked for the special car. It was out of sight, both before they found it and incidentally afterward. It was, in fact, nothing more nor less than a freight car with a stove and two benches in it. A cab, the conductor called it, but Deacon Halsted pathetically remarked he be Staten Islanded if it was a handsome one, But worse than all, there was not a single light in the car, which was not even suitable for carrying cattle, and the boys could not have their little game. At 8 o'clock the train started with the sorriest-looking lot of ball tossers that any one would want to see. Every half hour the train would stop and take a rest, and at Rochelle, ten miles out from Galineaville, an hour a stop was made and search for a lost our was instituted. The boys volunteered their services to hurry matters along. Now, all day Tom Burns had guyed his fellow players, and they had stood it like good little boys. But at Rochelle the comical coacles had a taste of the policy of reciprocity. Tom, wearied with his great efforts on the field of play, had gone and monopolized one of the two benches and was snoring as sweetly as a porker. In the stove a big fire was at its best.
